ECASS
European Cities Against
School Segregation

What can cities do against school segregation?

Globalization is transforming the urban space in world's cities. European cities are not an exception and are suffering a deep transformation in the physical and social characteristics of their neighbourhoods and districts. Increasing economic inequalities impact on higher polarization of social groups based on their socioeconomic condition or ethnic origin. School segregation is an undesired outcome of these negative trends. In a context of growing urban fragmentation and increasing presence of vulnerable and migrant children in schools, some educational policies have favoured the social segmentation of schools in many European cities.

The European Cities Against School Segregation (ECASS) Project, funded by the Erasmus + programme, has been designed to plan new education policies in European cities to tackle school segregation. Researchers and policymakers from three cities (Barcelona, Milano and Oslo) have worked together combining theoretical and methodological tools with knowledge and experience of the local realities. This collaboration has produced innovative policy instruments and devices to improve educational inclusion. This session will present the main outputs that the ECASS Project has produced in the last 3 years and will open a dialogue with policymakers and stakeholders with the objective to situate the struggle against segregation as a core goal of the European education policy.

Come and join us to know and share your experience about how to tackle school segregation in your city!
